

What is the purpose of a university? // It should be about education, the pursuit of knowledge, and the betterment of society, in my humble opinion // The relationship between me and my students, and nothing else // Research embedded within the curriculum // To topple authoritarianism // To educate citizens // To be a learning community, shouldn't it? // It'd be nice if it was about democratisation of education, like, communally. To educate and make society better. To solve societal problems. Maybe not all of them, but to attempt it // I think it's a problem to come together and do more good and each other. I mean, it could go on. The advancement of knowledge, the preparation of the next generation, I think to foster independent thought // To society through the democratisation of education. To be empowered and inspired by people and workers' // To educate our students as a whole and so as a collective towards the emancipation of all and of // To make sure everyone is treated fairly and aware of people's needs and act on them. I mean, education is the first thing that comes to mind. I guess it's more than that. Research, it's about providing good in the world, doing some enlightenment, also. I think it'd be To do research that changes lives, and teaching that allows our graduates to go out and change the world positively // ...
